the remote causes of the english revolution are discernible as far back as the time when the feudal system prevailed when the people were divided into two great classes the serfs and the lords with their chief melting monarchy then had no power but that derived from the conquering aristocracy the serfs were the slaves of the lords alike to till their ground and to follow their banner to the battle field upon them the nobles reeked their vengeance and ground them with oppression the vassal s only protection was the church and the clergy in that dark age alone shielded from oppression and administered food to the moral nature of man as the instructors of mankind they acquired a prodigious influence rivaling that of the lords in its extent to them the king tired of depending upon an overbearing aristocracy applied for assistance an alliance is formed between royalty and the church which surpasses the power of the nobles in this manner the crown advanced by the aid of the church and by its own inherent vigor until at last it excites the jealousy of the clergy against them the crown had recourse to the diminishing aristocracy and to the people thus royalty became predominant with the clergy and aristocracy subdued beneath it but in the meantime during these struggles the people were acquiring knowledge and maturity not yet sufficiently strong or civilized to assert its rights by degrees the belligerent powers coalesced and sat down together to divide the spoils of an oppressed people the invention of printing and the reformation aided to throw aside the veil from the eyes of the people they no longer bowed in slavish obedience in spiritual matters to the clergy they began to search to learn to think and to act for themselves the aristocracy were however still in a great measure the leaders at these events while the power of the monarch was increased by the addition of ecclesiastical pre eminence the crown became enveloped in feebleness the aristocracy degraded in effeminacy and forced to seek means by the sale of their estates to the richer commons to support their expensive profligacy as the nobles by these means decreased in wealth and influence the commons increased the extension of privileges however did not keep pace with the increase of wealth and the rights which had hitherto been exercised by the king without dispute were now inquired into because felt by a greater number of persons the commons asserted their right to prescribe the duties of the crown which on the contrary maintained its divine origin and the necessity of obedience not inquiry thus they were at issue gratitude to their sovereigns for the overthrow of property at first prevented the people from marking the limits of a power to which they owed so much their silence was mistaken by imbecile monarchs and their more imbecile advisers for docile submission and cheerful acquiescence the consequence was the despotism of the throne became more intolerable the remonstrance of the people more dignified and resolute they were unheeded or the authors of them treated with contumelious barbarity the spark became a flame and the re valuation was at hand this imperfect and rapid glance at the movements of society will enable us to perceive the origin of those causes which had accumulated and were now like a mighty avalanche about to carry all before them such
